

Lecture 3 — The Canadian Legal System

Jeff Zarnett

jzarnett@uwaterloo.ca

Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering
University of Waterloo

June 19, 2016

Acknowledgments: Douglas Harder [1], Julie Vale [2]

The Canadian Legal System is formed out of many traditions:

- The Rule of Law
- Code Civil (in Québec)
- English Common Law

As we've seen, it was once the case that monarchs were absolute.

Rulers claimed that they had the divine right to rule.

They could make, and break, the law at a whim.

They were therefore above the law.

(Image and quote from the 1995 film.)

The Rule of Law is the principle that no-one is above the law.

Black's Law Dictionary defines it as:

The doctrine that every person is subject to the ordinary law within the jurisdiction.

Rulers, even monarchs, are constrained by the law.

The Oxford English Dictionary defines it as:

The authority and influence of law in society, esp. when viewed as a constraint on individual and institutional behaviour; (hence) the principle whereby all members of a society (including those in government) are considered equally subject to publicly disclosed legal codes and processes.

Most jurisdictions in the world use the “civil law” system.

Civil codes contain a comprehensive statement of rules.

There are often general principles to deal with any dispute that may arise.

In civil law cases, the judge considers only the application of the code to the case at hand.

Civil Law is used in the province of Québec for provincial matters.
This is for historical reasons from when it was a French colony.

Canada, at a federal level, and in all other provinces, follows the common-law system as in England, the USA, and numerous other countries.

Medieval England had travelling judges who would render decisions.

One goal of the system was consistency: a similar legal case should produce a similar ruling.

Thus, when a case is heard, the ruling forms a precedent.

The principle is stare decisis: “stand by decisions”.

Thus, courts should generally stand by the decisions previously made.
This principle carries forward into the Canadian Legal System.

When it seemed that following the law would lead to an unfair result, subjects (litigants) could appeal to the King for equity:

Equity, simply defined, is just fairness.

A court may find that following a precedent leads to an unjust result, and may overturn a precedent on the basis of equity.

The idea of appeals still exists, though they are now to higher courts rather than to the Monarch...

In addition to statutes and regulations, legal decisions made by judges are binding on judges below them.

This means there are three sources of law:

- 1 Acts of the legislatures (e.g., Professional Engineers Act)
- 2 Regulations, codes, by-laws, etc. (e.g., O. Reg. 941)
- 3 Precedents set by previous judges (e.g., R v. Ron Engineering)

Thus, it is not enough to simply know the law and regulations...

It is also necessary to study previous cases in the area to understand the decisions and the reasoning.

Significant components of contract law are found only in precedent.

What if there is no precedent for the situation?

Maybe there is a precedent that is “close enough” that can be applied?

Perhaps there is a precedent that is similar and can be modified?

Can we find a precedent from another common law country?

The Supreme Court of New Zealand cites Canadian decisions quite often...

If there are no other sources, then a judge will have to set a new precedent.

As important as precedent is, parliament has supremacy.

That is to say, acts of Parliament (laws) supersede precedent.

And parliament, of course establishes the court system and the rules of procedure in those courts.

Recall that civil law is about restoring the injured party, to the extent possible, to its original state, or resolving a dispute between private parties.

If the parties cannot come to agreement without the intervention of the courts, a lawsuit is the method to bring the court system into play.

The initiator of the legal action is the plaintiff.

The plaintiff names in his or her complaint the party (parties) who has (have) allegedly wronged the plaintiff: the defendant(s).

The plaintiff must also specify the reason for the lawsuit: the cause of action.

A lawsuit, or case will be heard by the courts in the form of a trial.
It may be a trial in front of a judge, or a jury.

Each side makes its case and introduces evidence to support its position.

Each side also has the opportunity to rebut the other side's case.

At any time before the ruling, the parties may come to an agreement outside the courts and settle the matter without a need for the court to set terms.

No-One Escapes Judgement

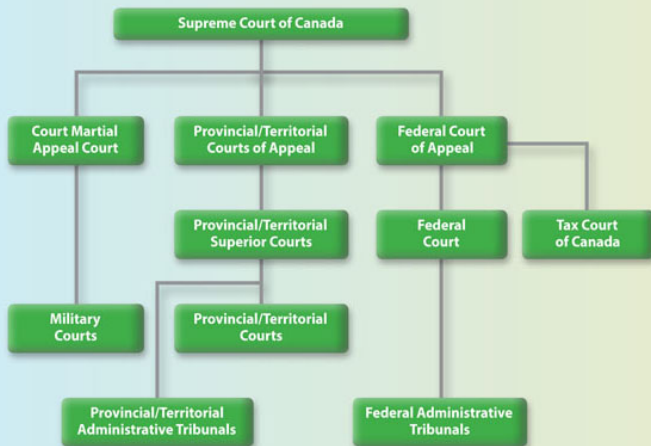

Once the trial is concluded, the judge (or jury) will retire to consider the facts and arguments presented.

Unlike a criminal trial, the standard is not “beyond a reasonable doubt”, but “balance of probabilities”.

Thus, it is not necessary to prove one side's case to a certainty; only establish that one side's case is more likely than the other side's.

The judge (and possibly jury) will then deliver the judgement or ruling.
This is the court's official finding of facts and awards of damages.

Outline of Canada's Court System

The Canadian Court System [3].

As we can see, there are many different courts in the country, each with different responsibilities.

Cases are initially heard in a “lower” court (at the bottom of the chart).

And the court must have jurisdiction to hear the case.

One way to think of jurisdiction: authority to make a decision in the matter.

The case of someone disputing his income tax assessment must be heard by the Tax Court of Canada.

If he attempted to file it in a military court or provincial court, the case would be dismissed or transferred because the court is not qualified to hear this case.

Similarly, if a contract is formed and executed in British Columbia, and a legal dispute arises, the case will be heard in B.C., not Nova Scotia...

We will return to the subject of jurisdiction later.

Let us now examine the courts as described in the diagram.

The descriptions are from [3], as the government was kind enough to break it all down for us.

We'll begin at the bottom and work our way up.

These are an alternative way of resolving disputes.

They deal with application of laws and regulations, such as eligibility for disability benefits or human rights.

These are not strictly part of the court system, but their decisions are subject to judicial review.

Provincial courts try most criminal offences, money matters and family matters.

The courts apply common-law principles (except in Québec).

Provincial courts may also include specialized courts, such as youth courts, family courts, and small claims courts.

Weird oddity: Nunavut has only one level of provincial court.

As before, at this level, the legal system in Québec follows the civil code.

Superior courts are the trial level of courts in a province or territory.

They deal with the most serious criminal and civil cases and have the power to review the decisions of the provincial and territorial courts.

The trial level courts may be called the Supreme Court, the Court of Queen's Bench, or the Superior Court of Justice.

The appeal-level courts, or Courts of Appeal, hear civil and criminal appeals from the superior or provincial trial courts.

Interruption: Court of Appeal

Recall from earlier that in medieval England, a litigant could appeal to the King to have a ruling re-examined on the grounds of fairness.

A similar idea exists in our legal system: a litigant may ask a higher court to review the decision made by a lower court.

It's not enough to simply be dissatisfied with the outcome; there must be a legal basis for this (called grounds for appeal)¹.

Appellate courts usually have the authority to decide whether to hear a case. If they think there is no legal issue to be examined, they will decline.

¹And sometimes one must argue for the right to even file an appeal, seeking leave to appeal...

Interruption: Court of Appeal

An appeal is not a re-run of the original trial; it's a review by a panel of judges.

Lawyers may present arguments as to why the original trial was flawed or the ruling was inconsistent or unfair.

The purpose is not to re-examine the facts of the case.

The appellate court may rule to:

- Uphold (affirm the decision of the lower court)
- Reverse (overrule the lower court)
- Vacate (annul the previous trial)

The court of appeal's decision need not be unanimous; a majority is adequate.

The Federal Court specializes in areas such as intellectual property, maritime law, federal-provincial disputes, and civil cases related to terrorism.

The Tax Court specializes in hearing appeals from tax assessments.

The Federal Court of Appeal reviews the decisions of both these courts.

In fact, it is the highest court of the land for about 95 percent of all cases.

The Supreme Court of Canada is the ultimate court of appeal.

It hears appeals from decisions of the appeal courts in all the provinces and territories, as well as from the Federal Court of Appeal.

Supreme Court judgments are final.

It decides important questions about the Constitution and controversial or complicated areas of private and public law.

The government can also ask the Supreme Court for its opinion on important legal questions, such as senate reform.

Recall also that the Supreme Court is the interpreter of the constitution.

Its rulings on whether or not a law is constitutional are final.

The Supreme Court is, in a way, a check on the power of parliament.

We have discussed how courts interpret and apply the law, but where do laws come from?

Laws are acts of legislatures (parliament).

Legislative branches may have one or two bodies.

- One legislative body is called unicameral (one-chamber).

- Two is called bicameral (two-chambers).

A law is introduced and passed by the legislative assembly.

In Canada, the federal legislature is bicameral.
The House of Commons and the Senate.

Provincial/Territorial legislatures are unicameral.

In Ontario, Provincial Parliament.

In Québec, the National Assembly.

In most other provinces, House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly.

Once passed, a law needs royal assent.

Royal assent is the monarch (or designated representative) signing the law.

As we have seen, the government establishes the courts to administer justice and enforce the laws.

Judges are chosen from members of the legal profession.
Those who are members of the Bar.

Judges may not:

- Engage in public debate about their decisions
- Express personal opinions on major social issues
- Engage in outside business

The judiciary is independent of the rest of the government (but judges are appointed by the government).

Laws as passed by parliament are not subject to review... with one exception.

The courts may, as is specified in the constitution, rule on whether a law is constitutional: congruent with the constitution.

The courts do not decide whether a law is good or bad, or whether it needs amendment or repeal.

Remember: the constitution is the highest law of the land.

The content of the laws as passed will vary significantly.

Some laws are used to raise taxes (e.g., income tax) and spend money (e.g., purchase submarines for the Navy).

Others relate to criminal matters: forbidding stealing, or legalizing marijuana.

In both these categories, the government is involved somehow.

Yet, a great deal of law is related to matters between parties, where neither one is a government of any sort.

For example, Alice makes a contract with Bob to buy a computer.

Both Bob and Alice are private citizens, but the government does pass laws that regulate and dictate how Alice and Bob may interact in this transaction.

If Bob has broken the contract, even though he may not have committed a crime, Alice may ask the courts to step in, hear the case, and render judgment...

- [1] D. W. Harder, “ECE 290 Lecture Materials,” 2013.
Online; accessed 31-May-2016.
- [2] J. Vale, “ECE 290 Course Notes,” 2011.
- [3] G. of Canada Department of Justice, “The Judicial Structure,” 2016.
Online; accessed 9-June-2016.

Disclaimer: the material presented in these lectures slides is intended for use in the course ECE 290 at the University of Waterloo and should not be relied upon as legal advice. Any reliance on these course slides by any party for any other purpose are the responsibility of such parties. The author(s) accept(s) no responsibility for damages, if any, suffered by any party as a result of decisions made or actions based on these course slides for any other purpose than that for which it was intended.